PROFILE

During my studies, I became very interested in mental health and psychopathology. On the one hand, I was intrigued by the complexity of human brain and how modern neuroscience allows the detection of neural dysfunctions. Therefore, I focused on alterations in brain circuitries observed in patients with psychotic and affective disorders during my PhD. On the other hand, I aimed to learn about the phenomenology of mental disorders and how to address them at the treatment level. For this reason, I sought to pursue a psychotherapeutic training in parallel with my research.

As a research associate and psychologist in the Precision Psychiatry Lab at LMU Hospital, I am part of the early recognition outpatient service team and I support research on early detection tools for patients at high risk for psychosis.
